of Miss. Bonnemain.

The suicide took place about noon. Boulanger stood alone by the grave of his mistress. for some time, appearing to be deeply affected by sorrowful recollections. An attendant, who had respectfully remained at some dissing to the spot. he found Boulanger lying dead upon the ground with a revolver denoted Shis right hand. A hasty examination of the ody showed that he had placed the weapon

He looked sad and pale, but otherwise there was nothing specially noteworthy about his appearance. The workman says that he has often seen Boulanger visit the cometery in the same manner, and consequently he did not call General's presence. The General at once proceeded to the grave of Mme. Bonne-main, which is at a little distance from the spot where four nien were working and which was hidden from their view. The men continued their work. About three-quar-ters of an hour after the General had passed the place where they were employed they wer 'ed by the loud report of a revolver, and,

... found Boulanger lying beside it. He was quite dead. His hand was tightly grasping a had passed through his head. The body was taken to his late residence in this city after permission from the proper authorities had been obtained. Boulanger came to this city from London a few months ago. He had not recently occu-pied his gorgeous residence on the Avenue Louise, but, owing to reduced means, had been compelled to live in a small hotel. The General's friends say that he has been inconsolable since the death of Mme. Bonnemain, and that he had aged perceptibly. He was much thinner than during his more proserous days.

There are many contradictory reports circu-

There are inany contradictory reports circulating in regard to Gen. Boulanger's behavior previous to his suicide. For instance, it was said shortly after his death became known, that the General had not in any way allowed his friends to form any idea as to his intentions. This evening those who formed his chourage admit that the contrary was the fact. They now say that recently he has frequently avowed a desire for doath, and it is added that the General had several times of late even made attempts to take his, own life. Ho had been watched as closely as possible by the friends who still remained loyal to him at the low water of his fortunes. Even the latter, however, appear to laye finally grown tired of their task and te-have determined to rasign their positions as, guardians of the fallen leader's life. With this object in mind his friends in this city recently warned the General's nice and the latter's husband that the ex-Minister of War, who at one time was looked upon as the man to lead "La Revanche" enthusiasts to lierlin, was so despondent as to be apparently determined to commit suicide. This nices and her husband arrived some days ago at the General's hotel in the Rue Montoyer, and so impressed were they with his demeanor that one of the first things they did was to cause all the weapons found in his apartments to be taken away and hidden where he could not get at them. Gen. Boulanger must have not save his life, and, unknown to his nices and her husband, he must have managed to scoure and hide from them the pistol with which he eventually shot himself. Even the General's valet, who had been instructed to use his utmost endeavora to find and obtain possession of any weapon the General might have shout him, seems to have been cleverly deed the managed to seed the same to have been cleverly deed to the head of the collapse of his wear near a second her husband he collapse of his have about him, seems to have been cleverly deceived.

Geo. Boulanger made no secret of his weariness of life since the collapse of his party, and particularly since the death of hime. Bonnemain. His friends now recall the fact that when the coffin lid was finally closed over the remains of his mistress he kept on repeating aloud in heartbroken tones: "Au revoir et a blentot."

Every day, at about 4 in the afternoon, Gen. Boulanger, since Mme. Bonnemain's death, has gone to the cemetery at Ixelies and has deposited some floral emblem, generally a crown, upon her grave. He would stay by the grave of his beloved friend sometimes for an hour, either singaged in prayer of in mournful contemplation. Over the grave itself the General had caused a pretty white tombstone to be creeted, and at its head stood a broken column inseribed.

A few days ago the unfortunate General de-posited on Mme. Bonnemain's grave a hand-some crown of flowers bearing on it the words: "A BIENTOT, MARQUESITE."

The family of the General and the servants of his hotel in the Rue Montoyer were somewhat surprised when this morning they heard him order his landau at a much earlier hour than usual, saying that to-day he was going to the Ixelies Cemetery at 10 in the morning instead of at 4 in the afternoon. The family and servants at first paid little attention to the change in the General's plans, and nobody seems to have had the slightest idea that he intended to commit suicide.

M. Dutin came to this city from Paris upon receipt of a letter from Gen. Boulanger about a week ago announcing that he intended to commit suicide at an early date. M. Dutin came for the express purpose of endeavoring to perseade the General to after his saind. M. Dutin and his former political leader had several loan interviews during which the former sale had good cause for alarm. She communicated her fears to the General's friend and together they started for the cemetery this morning.

In the mean time Gen. Boulanger had left the landau at the gate of the cemetery and walked slowly and calmly to the tomb of Mme. Bonnemain. He remained there for some time in deep thought and was afterward seen to be slowly walking around the cemetery.

Contrary to the first reports received of the affair, the General must have walked about the cemetery for nearly an hour and a half before he returned to Mme. Bonnemain's tomb. All reports agree in the statement that so soon as the General reached the tomb the second time he immediately placed the piztol to his head and shot himself. The report of the revolver was heard by the coachman who was driving the General's landau and by the valet who had accompanied the suicide to the cemetery. They both rushed to Mme. Bonnemain's tomb and there found the General quite dead, lying across the grave. Death must have been instantaneous.

The weapon which Boulanger used to destroy himself was a revolver of large callbre, so it is all the more extraordinary that it should have escaped the vigiliance of his valet, relatives, and friends. The dead man held this weapon tightly grasped in his right hand, and it was seen that the bullet had entered the General's head near the right temple, had passed through his head, and left it by the left temple.

As the police were bearing the General's body away from the tomb of his mistress, with the intention of placing it in the landau for conveyance to Brussels, the dead man's nice. accompanied by M. Dutin, reached the cemetery. The niceo fainted upon hearing the news, and M. Dutin's grief at being too late to save the life of his friend was excessive.

The police in charge caused those of the General's friends who were present to confirm the statements as to his identity, and then permitted the body to be conveyed to police head-marked.

the body to be conveyed to the General's late residence.

The body now lies in the General's bedroom in the Rue Montoyer. It has been prepared for burial, but it is only being viewed by the fixtimate friends of the family. The latter, it should be said, unanimously desire that the funeral should be of the most simple order. Some of the General's political friends are in favor of a public demonstration.

The body reposes upon a table draped with black cloth. The remains are elad in a black trock coat, upon the breast of which are several decorations, notably the Cross of the Legion of Honor, conferred upon the General after he had been wounded in 1859 at Turbigo, in Algeria, when a Lieutenant, with only three years service in the army. The wounds in the General's temples caused by the fatal shot have been hidden by pleces of broad white silk ribbon, so pasted on the head as to almost completely conceal the cause of death. The dead teneral's features are placid, and upon them there is not a trace, except the dimly seen white ribbon, of Boulanger's and ending.

In saids of repeated inquiries made by press nish the public with any definite information as to the written declarations which he has left behind him. Yeth its known that the dead man prepared several documents for publication in view of his sudden death, and that he had written and placed on his desk a number of telegrams announcing his suicide, which he intended should be sent to the persons to whom they were addressed as soon as the deed had been committed.

Boulanger left a will and political testament in his deak. It is said that the latter declares unshaken confidence in his party, enjoins his friends to prosecute the great aims he always had in view, and ascribes his own death solely to inconsolable grief over the loss of hims.

had in view, and ascribes his own death solely to inconsolable grief over the loss of Mme. de Bonnemain.

The funeral of the General will probably take place on Sunday afternoon. The General's mother, aged 33, is still firm in the belief that her son went to a fete and has not yet returned. Mme, de Bonnemain was an inseparable companion of the General during his exile in Jersey. She received his political friends and acted always as the acknowledged mistress of his household.

The General rose at 3 o'clock this morning and told his valet that if any person called to tell them to call to-morrow. In the cemetary Boulanger affected coolness, which disarmed the suspicion of his valet. The latter finally remarked that it was time to return for dejeuner, but as the General desired to remain at the tomb alone the valet withdrew, only to hear the shot a minute later.

The General was a great favorite with the servants and attendants. A fortnight ago he presented his chef with his portrait as a token of affection. Boulanger had been in communication with the communal authorities of Ixelles who had macadamized the path to Mme. de Bonnemain's tomb at his request and also offered a vacant vault in the tomb for the General's own use.

On learning of the suicide of the General Prince Victor Bonaparte called and remained at the residence for half an hour. The room in which the body lies is sumptiously furnished. It is draped in blue silk and adorned with a large portrait of himself, his daughter, and Mme. Bonnemain. A large photograph of Mme. Bonnemain was found under his ciothing next to his heart. The photograph was stained with blood from the wound.

Parr, Sept. 30.—The suicide of Gen. Boulanger has caused an enormous sensation in this city. The members of the Patriotic League are talking of a public funeral for the General, and they propose to inter his remains in France. It is believed that such action would lead to serious disturbances.

All the evening papers contain obstrary articles, but none, with the exception of Le Jour, reflects upon the political aspects of the General's life. Le Jour says: Boulanger knew the intoxication of the wildest and noisiest popularity. It was he who said to politicans that the weakness of one too often influenced the decision of another. His own end fully justifies that dictum. He had not the courage to suryive her who sacrificed herself for him."

Le Jour's article concludes with a scathing comparison between the manner of his death and his imperialistic pretences.

The news was a bombshell in the Boulangist camp. The absent leadors were forthwith requested by telegraph to return to Paris for a party meeting to decide upon the issue of a manifesto to the public. The manifesto will probably announce the continuation of the revisionist policy.

manifesto to the public. The manifesto will probably amounce the continuation of the revisionist policy.

Gen. Georges Ernest Jean Marie Boulanger had a long and admirable military record, but neither its length nor its admirability entitled him to his prominent place in recent French history. His bravery and skill in the field greal ready almost forgotten. As an intriguing politician, as a high conspirator, as a betrayer of a great public trust, and as the contral figure in the most famous state case since the attempt to impeach Andrew Johnson, he will always claim attention from students of the Europe of to-day.

Boulanger's public career began practically in 1888, when he became the head of the French Ministry of War. He was aggressive, as he showed repeatedly in the Chamber of Deputies. He tried to push Jules Ferry intrighting a duel with him, but was unsuccessful. In 1888 he rendered himself conspicuous by demanding a dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies, on the ground that a revision of the Constitution was necessary. In the consequent debate Boulanger showed himself to be a quick but impudent debater. He attacked M. Floquet with unprecedented flerceness, and ended with calling hims anameless liar. He resigned his seat, left the house, and was subsequently censured by the Deputies. The result of his insult to Floquet was a duel, in which Boulager was wounded in the throat.

Boulanger, then apparently resolved to get the French republic in the hollow of his hand, and he stopped at nothing to execute his resolution. He became the centre of a political clique which had already gathered a large foliowing. He was well advertised. Boulanger pictures, pamphlets, posters, and dallies proclaimed him and his black charger from the Chamber and his black charger from the Chamber and his black charger from the Chamber and the secure of a political clique which had already gathered a large foliowing. He was well advertised. Boulanger more and on Jan. 27,1880, he was returned to the Chamber and results in the Chamber sels, whence he issued a turgid address to Frenchmen in denunciation of the proceedings against him. Prominent Boulangists and the rank and file of the party were stricken by this filght. They regarded it as cowardly and inexcusable. Several resignations from the Recentive Committee of the party followed. Subsequently from London he contributed columns of defence to his still faithful organs in Faris, but all availed him little. The brave General on his black charger was a broken ideal. The fail from his advertised heroism to his flight crushed the imagination of those who had hoped for the resurrection in him of the Corsican conqueror.

The Senate met as a high court of justice on Oct. The argument of Beaurepaire was based on 1.200 documents and several volumes of testimony. It avenged everybody whom Boulanger had attacked. It exposed remorselessly every detail of the falling hero's public and private life.

The revelation of official rottenness was appalling. Boulanger entered the Ministry of War, penniless. Hardly in his seat he paid 25.000 francs to private creditors and deposited 60,000 on his private cacount with his lawyer. From the war treasure, kept in gold and sliver for immediate use in case of mobilization, he took 242,000 francs for personal advertising in posters, pictures, subsidizing newspapers, and buying his creatures. In the Ministry of War he had his press bureau under the management of Major Plet. His son-in-law, Driant, received from the press fund once 35,500 francs to pay off designers of the General's portraits. Michelin's L'Action got 25,000 francs; two other newspapers 10,000 each. The National received S000 francs monthly. A Boulanger boomer, politily known in the department he read them with royal munificence. Driant received in 1891 a grantity of 21,000 francs. To fasten to him men in his department he treated them with royal munificence of Driant received in 1891 a grantity of 21,000 francs. made Brigadier-General, and in 1881 was at the head of a deputation of French officers at the Yorktown celebration. Subsequently he was a divisional commander in Tunis and Director of Infantry.

Boulanger's intrigues with women were legion. He exercised an almost hypnotic fascination over them, and in no case failed to make the most of his power. His successive mistresses were numerous beyond belief. By his immorality he estranged himself from a spotless wife, who loved him, however, to the last. During his blackest days, after he was an exile and an outeast, she repeatedly affirmed that she was ready to take him back whenever he would give her the first place in his heart. The reconciliation never came, for the General preferred to die as he had lived, in a cloud of amours. The woman Pourpre, mentioned by Beaurepaire, was his creature. The house in which they lived was furnished not only with money from the War Department, but sheets bearing the War Department's mark covered the bed.

The more notorious relationship between Boulanger and the actress, Mile. Reichenberg, began thus: M. Georges Laguerre, a young and brilliant Deputy, was at the time engaged to one of the General's daughters, and was preparing to close his intimacy with Mile. Marle Durand of the Comédie Française Company. Mile. Durand introduced the Laguerre to Mile. Reichenberg, and he in turn introduced the General. The General and the names were inseparable. Mme. Boulanger, on hearing of her husband's infatuation for Mile. Reichenberg, got angry and threatened to apply for a divorce, but was prevented from donering of her husband's infatuation for Mile. Mechenberg, so her desire to avoid scandal and consequent injury to the prospects of her daughters.

contributions from France have been few and small recently, and the General was in struits for money.

Perhaps the most remarkable case of instruction with Boulanger was that of the Dutchess of Unia. She helped him politically and socially with her influence and money during his last two years in Parls. It cost her 300,000 francs, it is said, to get him into smart society and keep him there for a few months. She spent small sums of 1,000 or 2,000 francs now and then for his political benefit and eventually contributed 3,000,000 francs to the Boulangists' cause. Several gentlemen were constituted a "Comité de la Bourse de la Duchesse" to spend this money in practical politics and they speat it.

Boulanger's fascination for women was not due to his personal appearance. He was alightly below medium height. He had cold blue eyes and a Roman nose. His hair and beard were light brown, and showed no marks of his 54 years. Far from imposing on foot on horseback he was the most commanding figure in the French army. He was a clever conventionalist, and in the ballroom was considered the most graceful man in France.

WRECKED IN A HURRICANE ON REEF, BUT UNDINMAYED.

The smiling heroism of an American girl allayed a panic aboard the steamship Californian of the West Indian and Pacific Navigation Company on the night of Sept. 10 when the vessel was driven on a reef near the island of Aruba, one of the Dutch Antilles, by a hurricane. The girl was on her bridal tour. She to a wealthy young Colombian, Seffor Escobar, and was on her way with him to his father's estate in Colombia. She left this city with her transferred to the Californien at Curacoa.

She struck at 11 o'clock at night and ripped a great hole in her hull forward. The passengers were nearly all in their berths. The shock of the impact of the steamship's keel on the reef awakened all the sleepers. They rushed on deck with life preservers around them. Their fears were increased by a roar of steam up the stairway leading from the engine room. A steam pipe had been broken, and Engineer John Molt, Assaistant Engineer Charles Davis, and Oller John Stevens were all below. Davis had been sleeping. He was thrown from his berth, and, getting up, stag-gered into the engine room. He was overpow-ered by the escaping steam, and drowned by the rising water that soon completely filled the lower hull of the ship. Oiler Stevens and Chief iron stairway leading to the deck. The jet of escaping steam crossed the stairway. Stevens made a dash for life up the stair and got out on deck, where he fell unconscious. The chief engineer ascended the stair with the water, keeping his head just

The Siberian hove to windward of the schooner. Capt. Park assembled his crew and called for volunteers to go to the rescue of the four men, who could be seen lashed to the deck. Seven volunteers stepped out. They were Second Officer Henry Smith, Fourth Officer Savin Cross, and Seamen McLeod. Peterson, Cameron, Scott, and McLennan. The launching of the lifeboat was accoplished only after several gallons of oil had been poured everboard. It kept down the crests of the seas, and the boat was lowered. A wave swept it against the steamship's side, and it would have been crushed but for the nimbleness and strength of its crew. They saved it by leaning over the gunwale and receiving the shock on their sturdy shoulders. It drifted astern and to leeward of the battered schooner. The four men were just able, by supreme effort, to stand on their feet and fall into the bow of the lifeboat. They were much emaciated and covered with alt water boils. The reacue was observed by all of the Siberian's 300 passengers, who greeted the return of the lifeboat with loud cheers. The cabin passengers made up a purse of $50 for the rescued men, and Capt. Park gave them good clothes in place of the tutored ones they had won on the wreek.

The steamship Advance, from Brazilian ports, brought here yesterday Mate Smith and twelve men of the American ship Fannie Tucker, which was burned at Bahis in August. She was bound from this port for Seattle with railroad iron and general merchandise. She met rough weather and put into Bahis aleak. She caught fire in harbor and was entirely destroyed.

He and two other boys were hanging onto the rope, stealing a ride, when their weight broke it. The furniture came tumbling down on top of them.

Found Bend in Central Park.

Policeman Higgins of the Central Park squad found the body of a man lying in one of the paths of the Ramble, near the Belvidere, in Central Park yesterday. There was nothing Central Park yesterday. There was nothing to indicate that death had not been the result of natural causes. In one of the man's pockets was a letter addressed to William Ziegler, 414 Fast Seventy-third street. This proved to he the name and address of the dead man. He had been out of work for some time, and yesterday morning he left the house to look for a job. His friends, some of whom identified the body at the Morgue last night, think that heart disease caused his death. He was a cigarmaker and had a wife and four children. C. H. VENNER & CO. SUSPEND.

The Slowness of Cusha and Benver Water C. H. Venner & Co., bankers and brokers at 33 Wall street, members of the New York and the Boston Stock Exchanges, suspended pay-ment yesterday afternoon. The firm made no assignment and neither were the two Ex-changes formally notified of the trouble, be-on either Exchange.

The firm did in many respects a representa-tive business. It dealt largely in water and gas bonds of interior municipalities, and the present trouble is due, it was said at the offices of the firm, to their inability to negotiate loan on the water bonds of Omaha and Denver on the water bends of Omaha and Denver. The two issues aggregate about $8,000,000 and the banks declined to accept them as collateral just at the moment. The bonds, it was added, are undoubtedly good and are well protected, but just at this time it appears that bank Presidents and heads of monetary institutions generally can do business on "quieker" collateral. With this situation confronting the firm, the only resource was for it to temporarily suspend. The senior partner of the house is Clarence H. Venner. For fifteen years he was a clerk for George William Ballou, and in 1881 he started out for himself. His partner was W. A. Underwood, and at first the main offices were at Boston. Mr. Venner, two years ago, earned some distinction by issuing a circular stracking the management of the Atchison. Topeks and Santa Fé. subsequently reorganized under the direction of Kidder, Peabody & Co., also with heavy Boston connections. Mr. Venner resped a lot of criticism for his action at that time, and the friends of Atchison have never forgotten it. Mr. Venner became so unpopular in Boston that, practically, he felt it necessary to change the base of his business to New Nork, and on July 30 last the original firm was dissolved, when Mr. Underwood retired. Mr. Venner then had for his New York partner George P. Toby, and his Boston representative of what has since been the branch house has been Frederick H. Mills.

Mr. Venner and his friends think that they will be able to resume quickly. It is claimed that Mr. Venner has $500,000 in the business and $600,000 outside on which he can realize quickly, should he decide upon such a course. Mr. Underwood, it is understood, took out of the firm $200,000 on his retirement.

There were reports all day that two other firms in Wall street were in trouble, but that they were likely to pull through.
